"I'm getting brave," he said as he walked. Soon he came to a village and for a moment thought: "I don't know these people. They can be cruel to a stranger." But he straightened himself and went straight into the village, saying aloud: "I will conquer it, fear. "He entered the square of the village, and there he found the elders of the village gathered, murmuring among themselves. When Miobe approached, they looked up and mocked: "Who are you?" "I am traveling around the world to become brave," replied Miobe. The elders laughed. "Tolo! No one can find bravery where there is no." "What do you mean?" Miobe asked. The elders sighed unfortunately. "We've worked," said an old man. "Our village is being threatened by a mountain monster." Miobe followed the old man's gaze to the top of the mountain. "Look there," the old man said. He didn't want to insult the man, but he didn't see anything there. "Look," said another man. "See? He's got a crocodile head. A monstrous crocodile!" "And his body is as horrible as a hippo. A gigantic hippopotamus!" "It's like a dragon!" Another man cried: "With fire shots of your muzzle!" Now Miobe began to see the monster. He began to see smoke and fire, wrinkled skin, burning eyes. "I understand," he said, but silently promised himself that he would not be afraid. Then he moved away from the elders to the village. The children hid inside, refusing to go to school. "If the children leave," the women said, "the monster will descend from the mountain and eat them. Everyone knows monsters eat children." Farmers hovered inside their doors, shaves and rakes in their hand; Out of their horses, they were illegal. "We can't work," they told Miobe.
